

RELATIONSHIP LOVE

Be led of Light...

John Pringle

A woman searches for a man to marry, she is bright, tight and lovable, etc. The man is enticed but does not realize that there is a difference in organ dexterity, between treating her like a sister and respecting her more tender muscle groups by not touching them, as not to incite their internal transfer of serotonin. She offers out of hunger, following her flesh as he receives it without a committed heart of friendship or spiritual family relationship, being blindly flipped by the contact, and they both tumble down the tender footing of the mountain without the sure footing of purpose.

In both their minds they say that they will find love somewhere in the tumbling and it does not matter now since they are so young and resilient, she believing that she can change him into the man she possess in her mind that he ought to be, and he not knowing what joyous pleasure that just hit him without responsibility... how wrong are they both. She displays a natural urge to replicate herself and if the mark of his arrow misses, her body discharges its cycle and then in a moment of disconnect, they have their first fight.

Since, he has nothing there to hold him, he grapples with liberation, as her internals are in chaos, growing claws that insert themselves into him, making him run...

And so goes her tears teeming with guilt, turning to anger, signaling her heart to pour out more next time towards him or immediate anger if he refuses...

If she or he has a (parental) past that is in need of healing, those wounds may open and certainly will address themselves as if it were the fault of the current situation. She may even run about the other younger women, in hopes of understanding her dilemma, but instead causing great fear and trembling amongst those who are looking up to her; which is why she should discuss it only with those who are in committed relationship to God, strong enough not to be hindered by her fears (and they as well ought to be available).

Of course then (over zealous) outsiders would set up religious boundaries and call that man or men in general evil (who are not yet under their leash).

He will run out from spiritual family and seek out tender roots in sinners camps to recreate the scenario and try to figure out what he did wrong, never realizing that he is going about recreating the situation with another soul, learning how to be sneaky in the process.

Religious onlookers will just use it to validate their claims, being blind also...

So this is why God made rules... To guide us when we face a new challenge that we have not yet understood, and not for pre judgment...
